

Educational Institutions Offering Horticulture and Landscape Architecture Programs in the United States and Canada

Norman F. Childers

Department of Horticulture and Forestry, Rutgers University, New Brunswick, NJ 08903

This directory of institutions offering horticultural and landscape training in the U.S. and Canada has been assembled for use by ASHS members, administrators and teachers of horticulture.¹ This effort is a part of the activities of the Education Division of the American Society for Horticultural Science.

The data are revised since the first publication in HortScience, Vol. 8(3), June 1973.

My sincere gratitude is expressed to the many horticulturists and others in the respective areas who assisted in this survey.

The listings which follow likely will have some errors and omissions with changing programs from year to year. Will you kindly notify the author of corrections in your area so they can be included as the listing is updated from time to time. Thank you.

DEGREE-GRANTING INSTITUTIONS¹

Indicated below are the institutions offering baccalaureate or advanced degrees: B (bachelor), M (master), D (doctor), and T (credits transferable)². There is a wide range of horticultural specialization which varies among the schools.

HORTICULTURE AT THE HIGH SCHOOL LEVEL

Most high schools offering vocational agriculture will include some teaching of vegetables, fruit, ornamentals, floriculture and some landscaping as a part of their program. Percentage time devoted to these subjects varies with local interest. Where commercial horticulture dominates or where the schools are in heavily populated areas, more emphasis is placed on horticulture.

An up-to-date directory is published annually which gives (a) the address, (b) teachers and (c) high schools for each state of the United States. Title is: Agriculture Teachers Directory and Handbook, 3042 Overlook, Montgomery, AL 36109. A reference copy should be available at your state leader's office of vocational agriculture teaching, usually on-campus at the local state university, or the state department of education at the state capitol.

Another publication may be of interest to you which is entitled, Supply and Demand for Teachers of Vocational Agriculture in 1979 (Feb. 1980) by David G. Craig, College of Education, Univ. of Tenn., Knoxville, TN 37901.

A few high schools are offering horticulture courses who do not have federal support specifically for vocational agriculture. These are usually big city schools. This type of horticultural teaching should be encouraged since it offers a means of stirring early interest among young people who later may major in horticulture in colleges and universities.
